

“Treaty of clinical sexology”

Acad. Dr. Leon Dănăilă (fig.1)
Hospital “Prof. Dr. Alexandru Obregia”
Member of the Romanian Academy

Treaty of clinical sexology”

The volume called “Treaty of clinical sexology” (fig.2) of Prof. As. Dr. Vasile Nițescu inevitably includes biological processes of great scientific importance and actuality, providing fundamental data in understanding the pathophysiology of reproductive system in the intercourse. In a didactic manner, the author shows the complexity of neuro-endocrine interrelations, their role in normal and pathological function of genitalia in the interpersonal relationship after the sexualisation of human body. This explains how the animal intercourse, subordinate to a primary, basic and instinctual impulse becomes in humans a complex neuro-psycho act, conscious and differentiated.

The presentation of neuroanatomy data and proper layout, very clear, allowing easy understanding by any specialist of the links between the centre of analysis and control (cerebral cortex) with the lower levels of the nervous system – through afferent and efferent nerve fibres, with the pituitary and gonads, who also play an essential role in intercourse.

In a rigorously scientific form, and based on original research, the author having a documentary conceptual background of interest and utility, describes the influence of sexuality on the human body, the types of sexual activity, the sexual intercourse in relation to age, or under certain physiological and pathological circumstances, the endogenous and exogenous factors that influence sexuality, or the three types of sexually transmitted diseases, exposed in a personal form. The elaboration by the author of the sexological summary of consultation, with specific clinical and laboratory data required for the diagnosis of sexual disorders in men and women is a real and necessary medical support. This proves that the clinical sexology treaty clearer shapes the sexology as a multidisciplinary speciality with complex and specific concepts, the sexologist often being forced to turn to the cardiologist, endocrinologist, psychiatrist, psychologist, urologist, obstetrician, etc. In his own conception, the author presents in the chapter “Pathological sexuality” the cardinal symptoms in sexual pathology, the classification of male and female sexual dysfunctions, or their treatment - all so useful in practice. His own classification of sexual deviation is particular. The differentiation of sexual pathology based on the etiopathology of genital or extra-genital diseases represents a new and original concept in understanding sexual dysfunctions and places them more precisely in position regarding diagnosis, prognosis, and especially curative and prophylactic treatment.

Fig.2 - Treaty of Clinical Sexology cover

Presentation by the author of morally aberrant sexuality forms, degrading by libertinism and sexual perversions out of the way and procreation as a means of satisfying some playful, pathological impulses, is welcome at a time of advertising exacerbation of vulgar sexual forms.

Regarding major sexual deviations such as homosexuality, the author explains in particular the neostructural changes of the brain, which determine the physical and mental closeness of the two people of the same sex.

The author clarifies confusing and controversial notions, such as the so-called “G spot,” and proves and explains for the first time the morphological effect of hypererotism of the area, which he called “the H Area”.

